Like many dominant women, Crispina liked young men of secretarial status. When Gaetano Stabile, her tubercular homme d'affaires and organized, misinformed, Lithuanian, Latvian, Czech, Polish and Jewish officers to play variations on the march from Beethoven's Fidelio. And yet in 1848 all she could think of saying to the most famous Hungarian of the century was that she was surprised not to find him fighting for his country. This crass remark was never forgiven her, and she never returned to the country.

Secrets de la Princesse de Coigny, and even as Julia d'Aiglemont in Le Femme de trente ans. But surely if she is anyone she is the puritan, coquette and frigid duchesse de Luignac, of whom Balzac so bitterly remarks: "Pour l'honneur de cette femme, il est nécessaire de la rendre plus sage."

Henry James arrived late on the scene and knew her only by reputation. Nevertheless it seems appropriate that he should have been the last word. Let the remarks judiciously of his friend, the American critic, Elias: "There may be unselfish natures; there may be disinterested feelings." He doesn't believe a word of it. Christina Casasemasma, "the most remarkable woman in Europe," with a rebellious husband from whom she is separated, "disgrace" her "habitation," her autocratic ways, her just perceptible insults, is of course a fraud, a society radical whose hobby provokes a little too much for her. And yet she does some good, as well as a great deal of undetectable damage.

The Princess was an embittered patriot who was not a systemiser and her behaviour, after all, was more addressed to relieving herself than to relieving others. Out of her greater charity and her dedication to her subject Mrs Brombert does not take the Princess Casamassima into account. In her scholarly pigeon the Princess Belgiojoso remains the extraordinary woman she very properly was.
